Cirrhosis of the liver

Cirrhosis of the liver is a progressive chronic disease characterized by death of normal liver tissue, which is replaced by either fibrous or wavy scars or by a variety of perfectly functioning lobules. In general, the liver has the remarkable ability to regenerate itself after damage, and for this reason, the liver is often described as the "surgeon's best friend." The liver is the largest organ in the body, and it is located in the upper right quadrant of the abdomen. It is surrounded by a protective membrane called the peritoneum, which covers the entire surface of the liver. The liver is responsible for many important functions, including the production of bile, which is used to digest food, and the removal of waste products from the blood. The liver also plays a role in the production of proteins, such as albumin, which is important for maintaining fluid balance in the body. The liver is also involved in the metabolism of drugs and other substances, and it is responsible for the removal of toxins from the body.

Normal liver

As the liver does important functions, among them, the following are to highlight the products, which is necessary for the proper action of the liver: 1. Proteins (albumin, clotting factors, cholesterol and products of ergosterol, immunoglobulin, fibrinogen and fibrin), 2. Lipids (triglycerides, phospholipids, cholesterol, triglycerides and products of ergosterol), 3. Carbohydrates (glucose and glycogen), 4. Enzymes (enzymes of the body are again albumin of albumin).
